

MEGAN DAVIES is a social historian of health who teaches in the Health & Society program at York University, Toronto and a part-time resident of Hornby Island, BC, allowing her passion for the history of the province to flourish. In addition to her involvement with collaborative educational and research website projects associated with the History of Madness website, she does research and writing on marginal/alternative health discourses and practices, rural health, food and health, old age, and state health and social welfare provision.